I picked up one with a profile of a mau

"That is Lepoid I. He was called the You have many queer customers, I presume?" I remarked.

"Yes, indeed. They are an odd lot altogether. A while ago an enterprising young collector called in to see it he could get some Peter pence. He said he had nearly all the other kinds that were not too rare to be bought. I told him Peter pence were to be bought. I told him Peter pence were to be bought. to be bought. I told him Peter pence were not so rare, but they required a rare collector, for none but a pope could have them in his collection. The fellow was quite disappointed to learn that Peter pence was a tax formerly paid to the pope by the English people of a penny to every house, payable at Lammas day.

"A complete collection of pennies makes a very interesting study," continued he, replacing the drawer of German crowns and producing another of pennies.

"The word penny is said to be derived from the Celtic word pen, head—the heads

Among them I admired specially the Coventry half-pennies, Lady Godiva, and another with the head of Shakespeare on it, and was informed that they were not usual. particularly valuable. The most usual type, I saw, was the head of the reigning "This," said he, handing me a silver plece about the size of a quarter, "is called an 'Elizabeth shilling," with the face of the virgin queen. Here are William and Mary, and that recalls to my memory the oid couplet that has stuck to me like a burr:— "'Still amorous and fond and billing, Like William and Mary on a shilling."

"Coins of this class, and those commemorating some national event, are historical records not to be disputed, for they are a voice from the time itself."

A man came in at this moment and asked; "What do you give for 1856 eagle pennies?"

"Sure you have one?"

"Yes. Here it is."

The expert subjected it to a microscopic examination and handed it back with a

A poorly dressed old Irish woman en-tered the store and the dealer incontinently left me and hastened to wait on her. She took from under her age-fringed shawl a small canvas bag, untied it and emptied its contents on the counter. The young lady cierk, who had been making up some packages for the mail at a rickety desk, came to take charge of the Mormon money, and from her I learned the About a month ago that old woman came About a month ago that old woman came here with a bag of ancient Roman coins— large copper pieces they were and some-what common. We bought them of her cheap. Two weeks after she came with another bag of coins a little more rare than the first, and here she is again with some the first, and here she is again with some fine silver ones. Each one is wrapped in paper on which is written the name of the reigning emperor and the date of the piece. It takes a pretty good scholar to find out by those old and disfigured coins, many of them very rare, what period they belong to. Some of those she brought could not have been placed by any one in the store or by any numismatologist we know personally."

"And how did this old woman get them?"

"That is the mustery. Had they been a buried lot lately discovered they would not have had the labels. The woman is not sent by one who is posted as to their worth, for she accept a mere fraction of their real value. It is very strange indeed." Then I heard the Irish woman say, "Ni hev anither bag at hoime thet Or'll fetch when Oi comes agin."

"Where do you live?" inquired the dealer.

"Way out on Long Olland, sor, an' now Oi'll till yex how Oi kem by thim moneys. Oi know ye wundered how an ould woman loike mesilf could a got so much togither. There wuz a gintleman—wuz, because he is dead entolrely—a docther he called hissilf, that had a spare room in me house for the lasht tin year. He niver talked to anyone, hardly to mesilf, an' he wuz the quietest man Oi iver see. He niver docthered anyone, as Oi could see, an' all he did wuz to come to that room toward evening an' to come to that room toward evenin' an set there a porin' over books an' a bit av money till long into the night. Oi peeped through a crack minny a teime an' thet's all Ol could see.
"A short toime ago he fell sick an' Oi tuk care av him, fur he seid no one lise

Well, he died, pore man, an' Oi had him buried decent, but he tould me before the ind came where these bags avould money wuz an' Oi should sell them fur a pritty penny fur me own comfort. An' now yez know as much as Oi do mesilf. Oi'll bring the lasht bag nixt wake, sor." And the little old Irish woman went out with her toil-hard ened hand tightly clutched over a ten doilar bill she had been paid for a bag of rare coins, many single ones of which would bring the dealer $10.
